Drive

Discipline is a sought-after trait; rewarding, enabling; and it leads to power. Power is all that matters; power is my drive. This isn't to say I have an agenda, I refer to power as the feeling; with the feeling comes the genuine presence of power. Power creates flow, flow is the passing of time, the feeling of exhilaration with a task, a task which is difficult to the perfect degree; without being rigorous. The feeling of flow makes you unstoppable, it gives you power. Given power, you have discipline, motivation, you have drive.

Purpose

Drive is a synonym for purpose; not necessarily because it has a similar definition, but because drive inspires purpose; to be driven implies a purpose for being driven. My purpose, my drive, is the notion of creation; all-seeing or not, I want to create, no need. Over the course of my early childhood (allow me to be honest, I'm still a child), I had many outlets to express this need; first it was making structures in Minecraft, then making basic edits with the Adobe Suite, finally graduating to 3D modeling; the two latter's, in one way or another, lead to programming. Programming is quite literally the holy grail of creativity, it incorporates building, editing, and modeling all at once! Who knows what I'll make, but it'll definitely make something.

Freedom and Options

"Freedom" and "Options" are really buzzwords, more so "freedom" than "options," what I imagine, however, when hearing these words is this; exactly what makes me happy; options are more daunting than peaceable; having options doesn't mean you're going anywhere, it means you're drowning in all the places that are possible to you.
